

(c) and (d) An assessment of the over-all requirements of the Foreign Service is currently being made. The question of how the deficiencies, if any, are to be met, can only be considered in the light (a) of this assessment and (b) of the reductions possible or additions necessary in our overseas Missions, of which the staff position is also currently being reviewed.

(e) and (f) Apart from the review mentioned in the reply to parts (c) and (d) above, Government is always alive to the necessity of keeping staff in the Indian Missions at levels consistent with the requirements of work and functional efficiency and with due regard to the need for economy. Reviews are conducted periodically, and staff strength adjusted suitably in accordance with the considerations mentioned above.

(g) All diplomatic officers and the bulk of the servicing personnel in our Missions abroad are India-based personnel. In the larger Missions like the ones in London and Washington and, to a much smaller extent, even in other Missions, certain categories of posts like Interpreters, Receptionists, Chauffeurs, Messengers etc. have, for reasons as much of actual necessity as of economy, necessary to be filled by local recruits. In many cases, quite a few these local recruits are also either Indian nationals or persons of Indian origin.

The position in this behalf is kept constantly under review.
